

Myth of the speed menace

16 March 2006

The article Speed menace (Belfast Telegraph, March 9) misses the point.

For years many people have exposed the revenue-driven myth of the dangers of speed and with the release of the Government's 4th Year Camera Report (November 5) they were truly vindicated.

With the release of the above report Transport Secretary Alistair Darling acknowledged:

1. Speed is a very minor cause of crashes (Nov 1, 2005).
2. Cameras are hopelessly ineffective.
3. No figures quoted by camera-using forces are accurate, as there was no concession to "regression to the mean".

I recently received a correspondence from three serving police officers with 60 years service among them.

These three men had not only never seen, but they didn't know anyone who had seen a road traffic accident which occurred at more than 90mph.

Come to think of it, in 25 years in the Fire Service I don't believe I did either.

The vast majority of accidents occur below speed limits and are due to bad driving.

Thousands of drivers travel at 150kph-plus on German roads every day - and they are the safest in Europe!
